Long synopsis

While the Spanish flu epidemic is sweeping across the continent, a priest and his son return home to their family in rural Norway from missionary service in Madagascar. The priest has been tasked with deciding the location of a new church for the local mining company, which reveals itself to be on top of an old Sami burial ground. When the priest decides to have the remains dug up and removed, the dead come alive and haunt the settlers. Possession, although set in the beginning of the 20th century, is frighteningly relevant. The film unveils the darkness of human nature when they are under the huge pressure. Self-taught acclaimed director, Henrik Martin Dahlsbakken's feature debut Returning Home (2015) was selected as the official Norwegian film for Academy awards. He has made few impressive thrillers and this time he made a perfectly frightening horror-drama.
